Kevin Saunders wants city governments to trim the fat, and he's not talking about the budget.

Saunders, a former Corpus Christi resident who lost the use of his legs in a 1981 Corpus Christi grain elevator explosion, began his 50-state tour here Tuesday. He joined Mayor Loyd Neal on Wednesday in the City Council Chambers for a presentation and discussion about community efforts to combat obesity.

Saunders served on the President's Council on Physical Fitness and Sports under presidents George H. Bush and Bill Clinton. He is also a three-time Olympic wheelchair athlete.

"I battled obesity myself along with all my other injuries when I was in the hospital," Saunders said before the meeting. "Then, as I traveled around the country, I saw so many communities plagued by obesity."

According to the Texas Department of Health, 61 percent of Texas adults are overweight or obese.

Neal invited representatives from the public schools, universities, YMCA, YWCA and other health and fitness community members to discuss programs already in place. He also mentioned programs offered by the Park and Recreation Department. Corpus Christi Independent School District superintendent Jesus Chavez, saying he was "feeling bold," offered a suggestion for the school districts.

"We have a finance accountability system and an assessment accountability system," he said. "Why not a fitness accountability system? We could compete against each other and we would all win."

Saunders presented Moody High School with an award for excellence in health and fitness education. The school was selected for its Health Science Academy program as well as its recent installation of fitness equipment for students and staff.
